Executive Function Challenges and the College Transition

Brooks M. O'Brien Auditorium – EAB

McLean Gander, Ed. D., Professor of English & Senior Associate, Landmark College Institute for Research & Training (LCIRT)

The transition to college is hard for most students, and particularly hard for bright students who have challenges with self-management, or what are called executive function skills in technical terms. This presentation will review what current research says about executive function challenges and how these relate to the complicated transition from home and high school to college and emerging autonomy. While attention will be paid to the reasons that bright, capable students often struggle in the college transition, the main focus will be on the strategies that help students succeed and realize their intellectual gifts.
